Hitting a bright red, one-story, playground-quality corkscrew slide in your office doesn’t automatically qualify you as a progressive, forward-thinking workplace, but let’s be honest, it doesn’t hurt.

That is one of the first things you’ll see if you walk into the building at 100 Tech Drive in Lower Paxton Township. Formerly home to AMP Inc. and Tyco Electronics, the building is now the headquarters for D&H Distributing, a decades-old fixture in Harrisburg that has become one of the largest privately-owned companies in the nation.

That bright red slide, a tech-friendly, gravity- powered attraction to the nearby main street, is known as the “Main Street Express.” It sits to the left, and just beyond the front desk to the left of a wall of video screens, and can probablydeliver over 500 feet from the second floor to the main lobby or “Main Street” on any given day.

Recently opened in January, the new building, at 120 million-square-foot space, property records show, is now the fully-renovated new home for D&H Distributing, one of the first things you’ll see as you enter the building.

While the building is a prime example of modern construction, the brick-colored building and rising from Main Street to the second floor. Little alley marks are scattered about the lobby area originally had a more traditional, 1970’s, feel to it with less open height ceilings, and a kind of “the-big-guy” metaphorphor for a company that prides itself on traditions like that is one of the first things you’ll see as you enter the building.

D&H Distributing turns former AMP building into a workplace wonderland replete with a game room, collaborative spaces and a sliding board. It’s all designed to promote employee wellbeing and productivity, the owners say.
